Nazi resistance museum opens in Berlin

02 Jul 2014

A new, permanent exhibition dedicated to German resistance under the Nazis opened its doors to visitors in Berlin on Wednesday. The museum profiles groups of German men and women who risked and lost their lives fighting Hitler.

Chancellor Angela Merkel visits the new German Resistance Memorial Centre on Monday.

Berlin's newly-modernized German Resistance Memorial and accompanying "Resistance against National Socialism" exhibition were opened by Chancellor Angela Merkel on Tuesday.

In her speech the Chancellor said a wide variety of people in Germany had resisted the Nazis and that the museum was a chance to move beyond old narratives about German resistance.

But the museum aims to show that German resistance went far beyond the military elite lead by Lieutenant Colonel Claus Schenk Graf von Stauffenberg, portrayed on screen by Tom Cruise in the 2008 Hollywood film Valkyrie.
